This project is a creative nonfiction literary journalism story that attempts to show the evidence of racial profiling within the Macomb, Illinois police department. This piece details my personal experience with the Macomb police, specifically an event that took place January 15, 2015, in which my friends and I were victims of racial profiling while leaving the train station. Woven within the personal narrative are facts I researched about racial profiling in general. The information was found in three different ways: online websites, articles, and books, most notably information from civilrights.org, an article published by The American Civil Liberties Union, and a book written by Professor David A. Harris of the University of Pittsburgh. The gathering of the information took about four hours, over the course of two days, and the actually writing of the piece took roughly ten hours over the course of three days. This piece challenges the argument made by the police that 1) racism is not prevalent, and 2) they were only criminal profiling. By including this information regarding racial profiling in my work, I attempt to bring more awareness to an ever-growing problem of police racism and abuse, as well as distinguish between racial profiling and criminal profiling in general.
